

LSBF launches free ‘Introduction to Global Public Health’ programme

The online course will showcase insights from public health experts to understand the current global scenario and open possible career pathways.

London, 15 May 2020 – London School of Business and Finance (LSBF) has announced the launch of ‘Introduction to Global Public Health’, a free programme promoting awareness and knowledge of public health topics on a worldwide scale.

The fully online short course has been designed to help people understand some of the key concepts to public health, such as epidemiology, the main organisations involved in public health and their roles in global health management.

The launch of the programme has been inspired by the raised interest in public health, with a focus on sharing essential knowledge.

Christopher Jasko, Academic Lead at LSBF, said: “The coronavirus pandemic has established the role of public health professionals as a reliable and sought-after source of information.

“With this programme we are giving people access to these experts’ knowledge with an educational approach. Awareness and information have been important keys in approaching the scenario at present. We believe knowledge in this field can help people to better adjust to current circumstances as well as benefit many in the long term.”

The free course is designed for anyone looking to learn more about the fundamental aspects of global health as well as how pandemics are understood and managed. Taught by LSBF tutors and professionals in the field, the programme is also a starting point for those considering a career in the sector.

Enrolment in the free online ‘Introduction to Global Public Health’ programme is open until the end of May. At the end of the three-month course, all participants will receive an electronic ‘Certificate of Attendance’.
